Unlock boosts and shoot at special items to activate their powers! In this instructable, I'll show you how to make a little bubble. (PS, I found this somewhere on the internet, this is not my original idea.)First of all, pick your two colours you want your bubble too be. I chose a dark and light blue. Then go to Filter> Render> Lens flare, and use the default settings(I forgot to do this, this will make the bubble look shiny). Then go to Filter> Render> Clouds.Now go to filter> Distort> Polar Coordinates. Then Edit> Tranform> Flip vertical.Now you have your bubble, but it is a bit hard to see. Too make it more visible, go to your elliptical marquee tool (top left tool) and drag from the top left corner down to the bottom right corner. Now hit ctrl+Shift+I (for a mac I think it's command+shift+I), then hit delete.Your bubble is done! (PS, I can't make image notes, do I need Mozilla Firefox, or can I use Internet Explorer?) The Bureau of Labor Statistics defines an economic bubble as a period when "trade is in high volumes at prices that are considerably at variance with intrinsic values." When that definition is applied to real estate, a housing bubble is characterized by a sharp uptick in demand for properties, paired with a limited supply and widespread speculation in the housing market. Housing bubbles can vary in terms of how long they last and how severe the impacts are when a bubble eventually bursts. But in a nutshell, housing bubbles tend to do more harm than good on an economic level, at least in the short term. The silver lining is that housing bubbles tend to be temporary events, meaning the housing market and the economy are eventually able to recover. Housing bubbles tend to occur less frequently than other types of asset bubbles, but they also tend to last longer. The term "bubble" is not unique to real estate nor is it a new concept. In fact, one of the earliest bubbles occurred in Holland in the 17th century, as trade in the tulip markets exploded, then collapsed, erasing fortunes rapidly. Housing bubbles have occurred several times in U.S. history, though the most memorable bubble is arguably the one that reached its peak in 2006-2007. In that instance, the bubble was largely driven by the expansion of subprime mortgage lending. In other words, too many borrowers were allowed to take out mortgage loans they couldn't afford. As more people bought homes that increased demand, which led to more speculation. Meanwhile, the Fed was raising rates between 2004 and 2006 to help curb inflation. Subprime borrowers who had taken out adjustable-rate mortgages could no longer afford their monthly payments. Delinquencies lead to foreclosures, which lead to declining home prices, all of which caused the housing bubble to burst and the housing market to crash. The housing market crash had widespread impacts on the economy as a whole, triggering a recession. Some of the worst impacts included: 8.7 million jobs lost8 million homes lost to foreclosureLoss of equity for 95 million homeowners500 closings of community banks The act was designed to address issues in mortgage lending that made it possible for the housing bubble and collapse to occur. The act also resulted in the creation of the CFPB. The housing bubble was characterized largely by a push in subprime lending, which was fueled by speculative trading among hedge funds and other financial institutions. The Great Recession that followed saw net worth for American households shrink, home equity disappear, and unemployment rates skyrocket to 10.6%. As more people were put out of work, consumers cut back on spending and the economy continued to shrink. It took several government stimulus measures, including the Economic Stimulus Act of 2008 and the American Reinvestment and Recovery Act of 2009, to help get the economy growing again. Compared to the dotcom bubble, the housing bubble that happened in the mid-2000s was much more severe when measured by its outcomes. Like the housing bubble, the tech bubble that happened between 1995 and 2000 was driven by speculation. Investors were funneling money into up-and-coming tech companies, pushing valuations into the stratosphere. The bubble eventually burst as investors realized valuation estimates were way off the mark, causing a flurry of panic selling. But in terms of losses, they were limited to those who had invested in the bubble. Housing bubble losses, on the other hand, were spread out among a wider swath of Americans, including those with higher and lower household incomes. As spending among those with lower incomes slowed down, the economy itself slowed down, leading to a recession. Generally speaking, real estate and stocks have a low correlation. So what happens with the housing market doesn't necessarily affect what happens with the stock market or vice versa. The 2006-07 housing bubble and subsequent housing market collapse were an exception because speculative trading of mortgage-backed securities was a part of the problem. Those risky trading practices led to a stock market crash in September of 2008. That aside, it's important to understand how a housing bubble could affect your portfolio both in the short and long term. If you're a day trader, for instance, the impacts could be minimal if the causes of a housing bubble are not directly related to the stock market and the fallout doesn't spur a larger recession. But if you're concerned about a bubble preceding a recession, you may consider adding defensive stocks to your portfolio to help manage risk. For long-term investors, a housing bubble can be a reminder to review your current buy and hold strategy. If you own rental property, for instance, consider how a bubble may affect your ability to maintain tenants and collect rents. You may also think about selling if you feel a bubble brewing, but consider the bigger picture. If you can still afford to make the mortgage payments on the rental and your primary home, then you may be better off waiting for the home's value and rent prices to eventually rebound. That also applies to non-property investments you own. For example, if you primarily invest in mutual funds or exchange-traded funds, you may want to review each fund's underlying holdings to see how they may be affected in the event of a housing bubble. Rebalancing your portfolio can help with minimizing risk while also keeping you aligned with your investment goals. Consider talking to your financial advisor about the best ways to hedge against the impacts of a housing bubble or equity bubble collapse. A housing bubble is characterized by a period of rapidly rising demand for housing and an increase in home prices. When a housing bubble bursts, home values can drop, homeowners can lose equity, and, in a worst-case scenario, a recession can occur. The housing bubble of 2006-07 was prompted largely by subprime mortgage lending tactics and speculative investing on the part of banks. Compared to the tech bubble, the housing bubble was much more severe in terms of the economic fallout it created. It takes Stella and her friends on a mission to save critters, earn power-ups and literally burst the bubbles of some dastardly piggle minions controlled by "Bad Princess" Gale, Stella's ex-BFF and the villain from the last instalment. This time, rather than flinging birdie wrecking-balls, you're going to be flinging bubbles of a specific color to match them up and make them pop.Stella POP! soft launched on iOS earlier this year and today, you can check it out on Android in the Google Play Store.Thursday 12th March 2015 — Stella and her friends are back like you've never seen them before in Angry Birds Stella POP! — Rovio Entertainment's latest addition to the wildly popular Birds & Piggies family of games and the flock's first foray into the bubble shooter genre. Angry Birds Stella POP! brings a twist to bubble shooting gameplay, where gamers strategically fling bubbles to match and pop them, saving critters, toppling piggies and earning power-ups. In each level, gamers live through the distinctive personalities of the feisty bird Stella and her friends the artistic Willow, mischievous Poppy, scientific genius Dahlia and young daredevil Luca. In Stella POP! each bird is endowed with a unique superpower, and together they work as a team to burst the Piggies' bubbles - and confront Stella's old purple friend and nemesis, the "Bad Princess" Gale."We're so pleased to take Angry Birds Stella POP! globally!," says Heini Kaihu, Head of Studio at Rovio. "If you love bubble shooters, you will absolutely love Angry Birds Stella POP! Marrying an old-school bubble-popping gameplay mechanic with the Angry Birds Stella world and cast of memorable characters, Stella POP! is its own, very colourful bird of a different feather.""We're proud to share Angry Birds Stella POP! with fans worldwide today. Since we soft launched in Canada, we have been receiving great feedback. Fans are super engaged popping bubbles and toppling piggies," said Teemu Hämäläinen, Production Director. "This is Stella's second standalone game and fans will love joining in on her journey with her pals.""Stella's crew and the rest of the Angry Birds have always appealed to a broad mix of gamers, and this latest quest invites fans of casual and challenging puzzles alike to enjoy the wild and quirky Angry Birds Stella in a new light," add Blanca Juti, Chief Brand Officer at Rovio.
