It is a teaching method that includes a series of reading strategies in which students incorporate information from the text into their own schemes. At the beginning of history class, I give each student a copy of the story and commentary. While reading, students are asked to pause and add comments. They are encouraged to underline key words, bracket parts they don't understand, and write notes in the margins. I like to use different colored pencils and glue. After completion, I will divide the students into small groups to discuss their comments. In a discussion about students, I encourage students to add their comments. As we move into further historical analysis, these notes are really useful. You can go back to the story and look at its notes to clarify your understanding. They then use this evidence to illustrate maps of the island for navigation. On the maps, students must identify and write down the most important events on the island. This is a great way to help students really focus on the main elements of the story and setting.
